'Such a storyteller'

BY DAVID JENNINGS

Renee Morrison is a storyteller. More than reading words of paper, or blandly reciting from memory, when Morrison tells a story, she creates a world for her listeners to temporarily escape to. Through the use of a few props, some creative music, and sound effects and a vivid imagination, Morrison's stories remind you of the kind of tall tales you would hear while sitting around a campfire.

Morrison has been recognized for her art. She has been named a national storyteller by the National Storytelling Network and her book, Calico Ghosts, has received critical acclaim.

"Some people like to play games, chess and checkers, others like to golf...I tell stories," said Morrison. During work hours, Morrison is a wildlife biologist and manages the Jacksonville State University Field Schools at the Little River Canyon Center. She often merges her skills of storytelling and knowledge of animals when hosting programs for kids.

"I feel sorry for a lot of kids today. Kids who only have Nintendo Wii and PS2s and PSPs and iPods and iPads, because so many kids today don't know what it feels like to go outside, walk barefooted in the grass, catch lightning bugs and feed them to toad frogs and watch their throats light up," said Morrison. "All of those cool things that really don't cost anything.

Morrison's love for storytelling and animals may have come from her days as an only child playing with animals on her family's farm. When she was younger, Morrison told of a time where she convinced herself she was a black and tan coonhound named Midnight. As Midnight, she would talk to the animals. It is that kind of imagination world that Morrison says too many kids today are missing out on.

"I want kids to live in fairy land as long as they can," said Morrison. "To have these imaginative experiences and create creative characters because I think that from the time they are born they have this creative essence that God gives to them, and it is a gift. And so many times it is mushed out of them and taken from them. But, it is important for kids to love to read. It is imprudent for them to read things they enjoy as well as things we think they should read, it is a nice balance there."

Morrison reminded the Exchange that Canyon Festival 2010 would be held at the Little River Canyon Center on Nov. 6 from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. The event will have art, exhibits, demonstrations, hikes, children's activities, music, great food and more.

the trail. I had just over a dozen volunteers helping me," said Di Biane. "A few of these were especially helpful and spent several eight-hour days out there with me, cutting brush, getting things up by hand, and coating with poison ivy and treated by the occasional snake."

"It took us about three months to get the trail in riding condition. The more we use it, the harder the trail will become, and the faster the trail will be. We still have work to do on the surface here and there where it is uncomfortable and still, but most of the trail is now in its final shape."

Di Biane says the new trail is 2.8 miles long and offers different tracks for cyclists of different experience.

"There are four options," said Di Biane, "and they're all marked with colored aluminum markers. The yellow is 0.55 miles, the orange is 1.10, the blue is 1.55 and the red is 2.80. The yellow is for kids, beginners who want to stay within view of their eye on them while sitting on nearby benches. The other loops take you into the main woods. This piece of land is almost completely wooded, and it is also quite hilly, so the trail has a lot of climbing in it, a lot of ups and downs. The red, or longest loop, takes you all the way up to the water towers, around them, and back down."

Not only does the terrain make the Henry Farm Trail stand out from other trails, the fact that it is connected to the Chief Ladiga Trail makes it a unique attraction for cyclists.

"What makes the trail unique is the trail head at the bridge, the fact that it is connected to Chief Ladiga Trail, which is a very well-maintained trail," added Di Biane.
